RECAP: Work is where most of us will spend the majority of our lives, yet rapid technological changes like AI can leave us wondering if our daily contribution truly matters. Looking at the overarching story of Scripture reveals that God is a worker who designed us as co-workers to reflect His nature and activity. While disobedience distorted our relationship with work, God reorders, restores, and redeems our work through Jesus, reminding us that our identity rests in being His masterpiece rather than in what we produce.

MAIN POINTS

- Work is necessary
- Work is a blessing
- Work is for good
- Work is not your master
- Work is not your savior

GETTING STARTED

- When you think about your daily work or routine, do you more often view it as a necessary burden, a source of identity, or a way to reflect God's goodness? How do technological shifts or fears about the future impact your perspective on your job?

SCRIPTURE

- Genesis 1:1; 1:26; 1:28; 1:31; 3:16-17; Romans 10:9-11; Ephesians 2:8-10

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

- Read Genesis 1:26-28. How does knowing that God is a worker who created humanity to be co-workers change the way you view your daily tasks, whether at a job, at home, or in school?
- In what ways can work subtly become an idol or a master that defines our worth, especially in a high-achievement culture? How does Ephesians 2:8-10 dismantle the lie that "if I don't make it, I don't matter"?
- Discuss the difference between letting work be your savior versus letting Jesus be your Master and Savior. How does trusting Jesus bring peace when navigating uncertainty in your career or retirement?

APPLICATION

- Leave it better than you found it: Identify one person or one situation in your workplace, school, or home this week that you can intentionally leave better than you found it.
- Test who you trust: Examine where you are placing your ultimate security and identity. If work or performance has become your master, declare openly in prayer that Jesus is your Lord and Savior.
- Reframe your daily routine: Before starting your workday or daily responsibilities tomorrow, pause to pray and remind yourself: "I am God's masterpiece, and my worth comes from Him, not from my output."
