Early History of Earth

Step into your imaginary time machine, punch a few buttons, and get ready to explore a place to which you'll probably never want to return—primitive Earth.

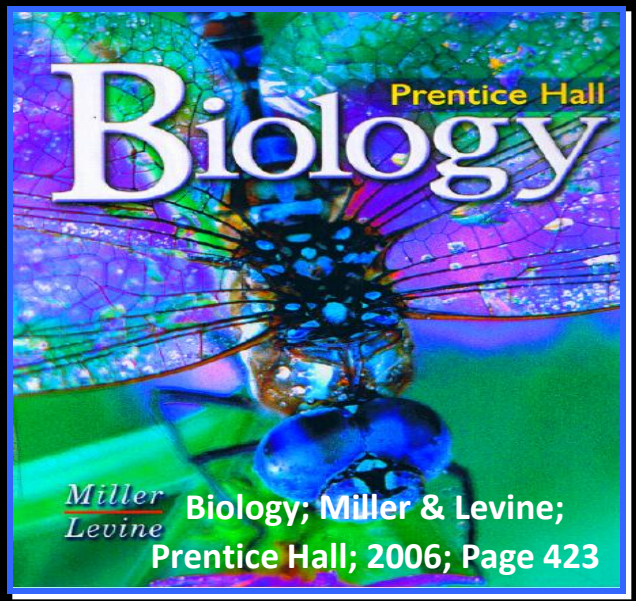

Early Earth was an inhospitable place

Earth is thought to have formed about 4.6 billion years ago. It was very different from today's Earth. Figure 17.1 illustrates what it may have looked like. Scientists theorize that Earth began as a hot ball of rock. Meteorites

The Top Lies of Darwinism

Darwinian Lie 1:

Life came from non-life

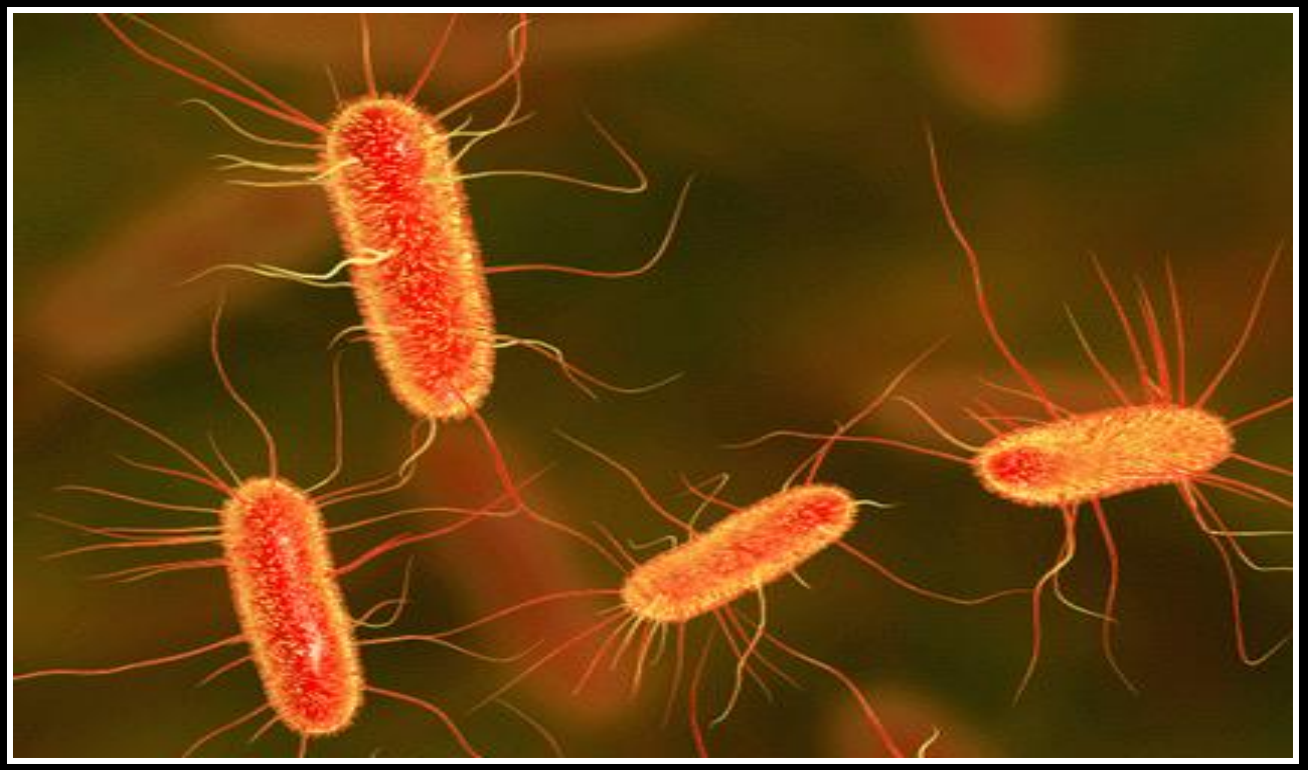

Darwin's little warm pond

Spontaneous generation

Abiogenesis

The Law of Biogenesis

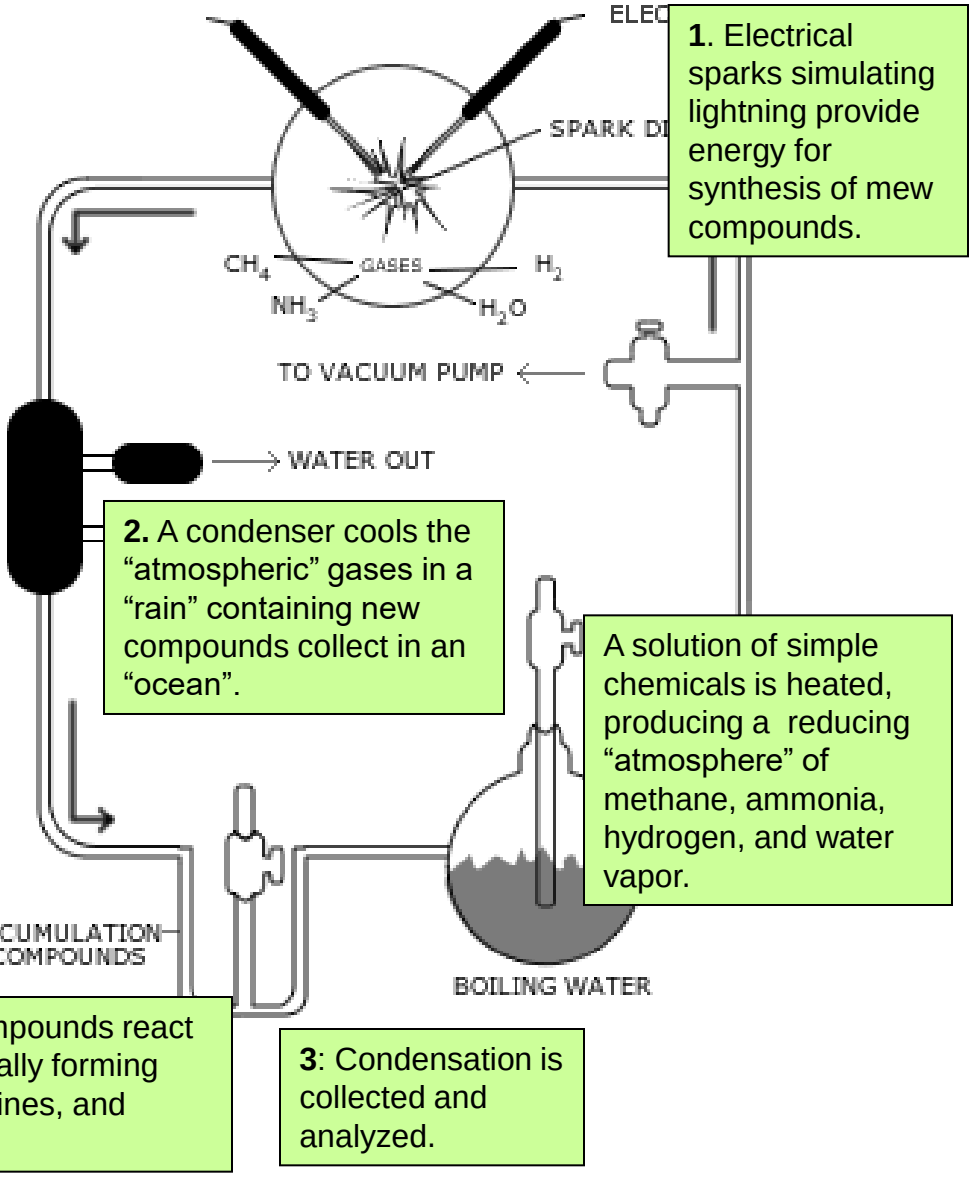

Life only comes from living matter

Has Life Been Made In a Lab?

- Absolutely not!
- The Urey-Miller experiment does not create living matter, only some non-living chemical compounds!

Law of Biogenesis

has never been observed to have been violated.

1. Electrical sparks simulating lightning provide energy for synthesis of mew compounds.

2. A condenser cools the "atmospheric" gases in a "rain" containing new compounds collect in an "ocean".

A solution of simple chemicals is heated, producing a reducing "atmosphere" of methane, ammonia, hydrogen, and water vapor.

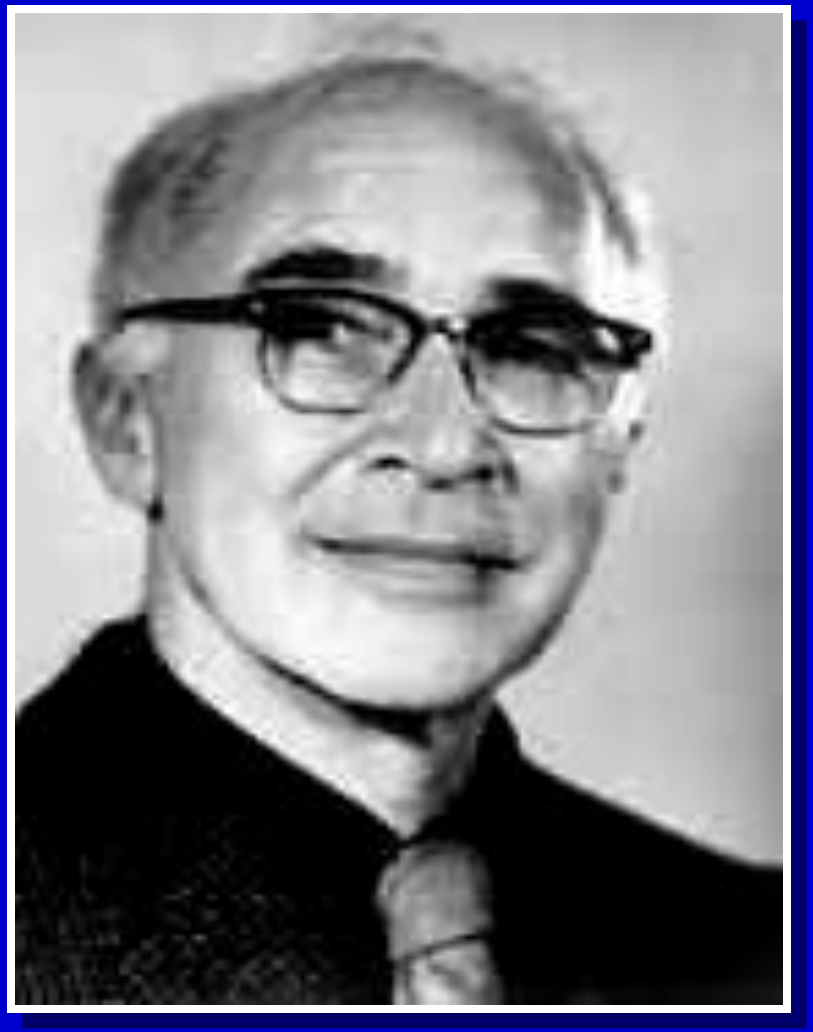

The organic compounds react in water, eventually forming purines, pyrimidines, and amino acids.

3: Condensation is collected and analyzed.

Life began as a "simple cell"

Glenco Biology Pge 324; 1998

Simple Molecules from the Atmosphere All the many forms of life on Earth today are descended from a common ancestor, found in a population of primitive unicellular organisms. What were those first cells like? How do we know? What events led up to their formation? No traces of those events remain, and scientists can't travel backward in time to wit-

▲ Figure 26–3 This diagram illustrates phylogenetic, or evolutionary, relationships among major groups of animals. Groups shown close together, such as echinoderms and chordates, are more closely related than groups that are shown farther apart, such as echinoderms and cnidarians. During the course of evolution that produced these different groups, important traits evolved. Animals that are more complex typically have specialized cells, bilateral body symmetry, cephalization, and a body cavity.

Trends in Animal Evolution

Your survey of the animal kingdom will begin with simple forms and move through more complicated ones. These different phyla are related to one another by a common evolutionary heritage. The diagram in Figure 26–3 shows our most current understanding of phylogenetic relationships among groups of living animals. A comparison of the groups in the diagram shows important trends in animal evolution. Complex animals tend to have high levels of cell specialization and internal body organization, bilateral body symmetry, a front end or head with sense organs, and a body cavity. In addition, the embryos of complex animals develop in layers.

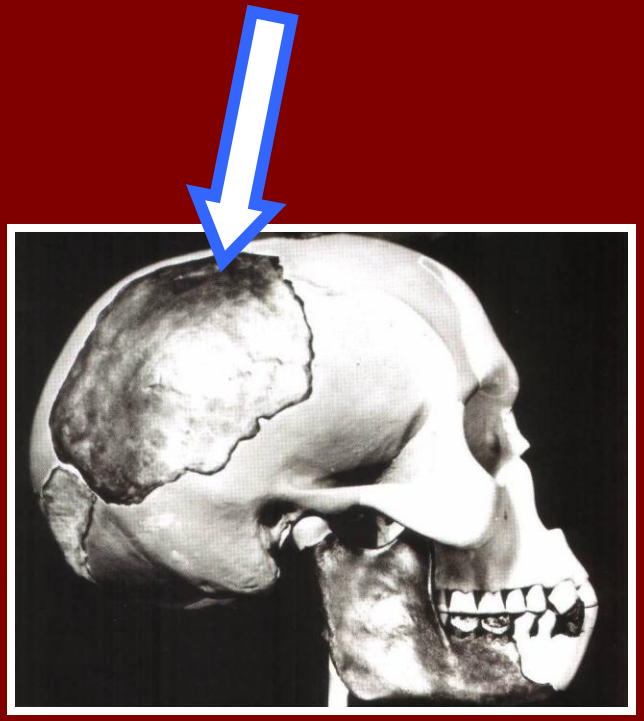

Cell Specialization and Levels of Organization As animals have evolved, by natural selection and other evolutionary processes, their cells have become specialized to carry out different functions, such as movement and response. Large
