How the Universe Will End

Take note of wording and concepts that reveal the author's basic Worldview Assumption

“...the entire universe grew from a speck far smaller than a proton to a nugget the size of a grapefruit, almost instantaneously, when the whole thing was .0000000000000000000000000000001 sec. old. This turbo-expansion was driven by something like dark energy but a whole lot stronger. What we call the universe, in short, came from almost nowhere in next to no time.

...billions of years from now ... all that will be left in the cosmos will be black holes, the Burnt-out cinders of stars and dead husks of planets. Eventually, even these will decay, leaving a featureless, infinitely large void. Unless, of course, whatever inconceivable event that launched the Big Bang should recur, and the ultimate free lunch is served once more.”

By the time the final chapter of cosmic history is written — further in the future than our minds can grasp — humanity, and perhaps even biology, will long since have vanished. Yet it's conceivable that consciousness will survive, perhaps in the form of a disembodied digital intelligence.

If so, then someone may still be around to note that the universe, once ablaze with the light of uncountable stars, has become an unimaginably vast, cold, dark and profoundly lonely place.”

-Michael D. Lemonick
