JORDAN TAYLOR

My first month in The Philippines has been off to a great start. I have adjusted pretty easily, although it has come with its challenges; like reptiles and lots of insects, LOL. As you may know, I have been here before, so it has been so fun to reconnect with all of the girls. They love to ask me questions about my life and about the USA. I never know what question they will come up with next. They also love to teach me about their culture and how things are different here versus the states. These are such cool conversations to have as you can see their wheels turning as I answer their questions.

When I arrived, we had a teacher here from New Zealand who made things so fun. One night, the girls stuffed chickens and cooked them over a fire. Then we had a big feast together! They even learn about American history, which has been fun for me to help teach them. One girl even quizzed me on the Founding Fathers.

I am so thankful that this first month has been an easy transition and I am excited about everything that God has in store for me here. :) Now we are getting back into a normal routine. I am learning about their homeschool program so that I can help them.
