Points About Fathers

Charles Dailey

I have lived long enough to say something about the role of a father. I recall seeing my father just once when he delivered sand for my sandbox. I may have been five years old.

I was raised by a mother figure who sacrificed much (and put up with a lot) to raise me to adulthood. But the missing father kept me from having a normal childhood. That cannot be replaced. So please don't ask me about fishing and hunting.

I do see that if there is a father, a child should keep the lines of communications open and respect in place. Agreement may not be possible, but respect should persist, even in the face of differences. When I see men struggling with other people in their world, I often find someone who couldn't get along with their dad. After the dad dies, there is no way to cover the scar.

A leading male figure in my life was Don DeWelt, originally from Portland. He was my favorite professor in Bible College and I took all of his classes. In the evenings, he held gospel meeting in area churches and I was there with Lois. He often broke out into song and those songs are still in my head. They often pop out. His views helped form my world views. As a father, a man has a great opportunity to affect those around him, and especially his own children, for years to come.
