Martha's Musings

Last Sunday, as I opened our garage door to leave for church, I saw a lovely sight. Two tanagers, probably a mated pair, were house hunting in the tree next door. For the uninformed, a tanager is a bird similar to a cardinal, except it has no crest and is red on the top then ombres into a burnt orange. I do not think the word "ombre" was in use when I was growing up. Which brings me to my next topic, which is my vocabulary. I have always thought mine was pretty good. I have apparently been mistaken. I opened a Reader's Digest book and randomly landed on the answer page for their "Word Power" segment. I usually do very well with this stuff – but not these words. Just seeing the answers, I only knew about half of these particular words. Feeling rather sad about the state of my intelligence, I decided to see if we had the ingredients to make a Jello salad, which sounded refreshing. Unfortunately, we were missing a few things, and it looked like a trip to the store was upcoming. But the heat index was scary, and Hubby did not think I should go, so the only choice I had was to rely on my not-so-bright brain. Guess what? My brain rallied and a great idea appeared, so my dish was going to be good after all. The point of all this seemingly unrelated stuff is that our God is just GRAND! He colors our world with beauty, reminds us to remain humble, but still helps us with the minutiae of life. My brain may not always be at its peak, but my faith is just dandy. PTL!

Blessings,

Martha Arizpe, St. John's Prayer Team

PS – Examples of words I did not know in RD: kukri, toxophilite, cholla. (Ask Google.)
