

Forthright Trust
Psalm 91, 131, & 77
Al Gascon | June 21, 2026

- Intimate dwelling in the presence of God reveals his awesome protection.
 - Therefore, in all forthrightness, do I dwell with my God or give him pop-ins or emergency room visits?

- Affliction and suffering do not mean God's protection or providence is gone. Rather, they mature me, and I still must trust God in the midst of every adversity.
 - Therefore, in all forthrightness do I trust my God in both trying times and prosperous times?

- When God allows things or circumstances in our lives that wean us from things we have relied on, we should never despise it. "Blessed are those afflictions which subdue our affections, which wean us from self-sufficiency, which educate us into Christian manliness, which teach us to love God not merely when he comforts us, but even when he tries us." (Spurgeon)

- There is always evidence for trusting in God. It's found within scripture, within the church, and within my own life.
 - Therefore, in all forthrightness, do I remember the evidence for trusting God when disaster hits home?
